You can have a pristine signal from your amplifier, but if you hook them up to soda cans, things are going to sound bad. Many factory-installed systems lack clarity because the speakers are used to try to cover the entire frequency range. But this doesn't offer the best sound as the bass is generally nonexistent, and higher frequencies are not sharp. This isn’t the main amplifier that powers your speakers. Rather, it’s the device in your car stereo that controls the equalization, volume, balance left to right, fade front to back, and some other advanced features.

If you plan on upgrading the head unit in the future, consider that as well. If you're working on a tight budget, you can do some things to improve the sound. You can even replace components one at a time, as your budget permits, and eventually, you'll have a completely custom car sound system. The most important thing to remember is that your car stereo probably doesn't sound as good as you might think it does, and that isn't a judgmental statement. The sound system is one of the places that original equipment manufacturers almost universally neglect in the name of higher profits.
