Compared to the cheaper modern set I got for the guest room, it looks more elegant and timeless and reminds me of her and the time we spent at their house. At his Summer Weekend Auction, Bourgeault is proud of Lot 566, a portrait of a soldier from the War of 1812, John Langdon Eastman. <https://www.lacredence.com/en/> has come straight from Eastman's descendants, along with two military commissions, one signed by Thomas Jefferson and the other by James Madison and James Monroe. At auction, all he says is that this "beautiful portrait" is "one of the nicest I've ever seen." It sells quickly for $9,000, just under his pre-auction estimate. A frequent guest on Antiques Roadshow, Ron Bourgeault says society's waning interest in history might be causing the "romance" of the antiques business to be lost.

Over the years, the Furniture Department of The Conservation Center has helped conserve many works of furniture, both from museums and private clients. Can be termed an "Antique" when its value mainly lies in its age, rarity, authenticity, and other special features that reflect the story of its era. There are various reasons why certain people tend to lean towards antique furniture, even in the current modern and futuristic epoch.

And while that can sometimes work, in a piece like this, where there's so much beauty in the natural wood grain, we recommend leaving it. However, if you come across an antique that has good bones but is pretty beat up, you can always strip and sand the existing stain, then refinish it with a fresh coat of stain. With over 25 years of handcrafting antique reproductions, Laurel Crown stands by its commitment to bring you furniture of exceptional beauty and guild-quality workmanship. Every piece we offer has to meet the Laurel Crown standard of quality for aesthetic appearance, durability, comfort, and accuracy.

This furniture period takes the scrolling effects of the Rococo Revival designs and adds more flowers and fruits to the styles. More detail is spent on the leaves—so much that one can tell if they are to represent grape, rose or oak leaves. Technology advances enhanced this design style, as manufacturers developed a way of laminating woods together. This layered effect was achieved by gluing thin layers together, with the grains running at right angles on each new layer. The thick panels created were then steamed in molds to create the illusion of carving. The woods used as a basis for the heavy ornamentation were mahogany, walnut and some rosewood.

These lovely Italian wall lamps feature a perfectly shaped shade.

As an added bonus, it's definitely easier to repaint the furniture rather than the whole room when they start to crave the "big kid" look.

John and Joseph W. Meeks also enjoyed success with laminated furniture.

It is named for the style that was popular in France as the Bourbons tried to restore their claim to the French throne, from 1814 to 1848. The Empire period influence is felt, but French Restoration lacks some of the ornamentation and fussiness of that period. Design motifs continue to reflect an interest in the classics of Greece and Egypt. Chair backs are styled with curved and concave crest rails, making them a little more comfortable than earlier straight-back chairs. The use of bolster pillows and more upholstery is starting to emerge. The style was only popular in clusters, but did entice makers from larger metropolitan areas, such as Boston and New Orleans, to embrace the style.

This design style features the use of scrolls, either in a "C" shape or the more fluid "S" shape. Carved decoration in the form of scallop shells, leaves and flowers, particularly roses, and acanthus further add to the ornamentation of this style of furniture. Legs and feet of this form are cabriole or scrolling. Other than what might be needed structurally, it is often difficult to find a straight element in Rococo Revival furniture.
