

The Global Takeover Of 'Minecraft' Earth Beta' Starts This Month

We haven't seen much talk about Minecraft Earth in a while. It is an augmented reality version of Mojang's game that turns the world into a playground full of your own blocky creations. The company promised that a beta version of the game would be available this summer. Now, with a new trailer of the game, the company has announced that it will be available on iOS within the next two weeks. Android will follow "soon afterward."

After seeing live gameplay during WWDC last month, the release of iOS-first isn't a surprise. While the new trailer offers lots of details on the game's gameplay, interested players may wish to go back to the Apple demo to get a experience of the experience to play in the virtual Minecraft world with their friends, which overlays the real world.

To be among the first players to have access, you'll need to sign up for the game right here (you'll require a smartphone running at least iOS 10 or Android 7 to play, as per the FAQ). CHAKRIBAKRI'S BLOG to the game is limited as they adjust load to servers. However, you must be active to continue playing. If you aren't playing for seven consecutive days, someone else will take your slot. You'll need an account on Microsoft or Xbox Live account to register and once you've registered, there's nothing left to do but wait, and get ready to build.

Think life is good? It's about get even more beta! A few locations will be getting the Minecraft Earth closed beta. Find out what to expect and register to be a part of the fun!
