Tray column that is dealing with throughput problems can be debottlenecked by changing a bit of trays with packing. The packing will provide extra interfacial contact area for the liquid-vapor contact, thereby increasing the efficiency of the separation for the same column peak. In addition, packed columns tend to be shorter than tray-type columns. The packed column is often referred to as a continuous-contact column, whereas a trayed column is called a staged-contact column because of the manner during which the vapor and liquid come into contact. The more intimate the contacting between vapor and liquid, the better the separation that each tray achieves.
