Judith Cofer (Don't Call Me a Hot Tamale) and Marcus Mabry (Living in Two Worlds) both come from different backgrounds but both share a common sentiment within their writings: that culture and heritage is one thing you can never run away from. They both have excelled in their education and have broken away from environments that produced little prosperity. Then they felt alienated when surrounded by people who have an entirely different heritage or economic situation. The difference between the two is that Mabry feels guilt for breaking away from his home and culture while Cofer feels misunderstood and alone because of how people react to her culture and ethnicity.

Mabry, a student at Stanford University in California, feels guilt. He's living in a swanky on-campus apartment with a roommate while in New Jersey his mother is working as a practical nurse to provide for his brother. His brother is dealing with prejudice, possible unemployment, high school, and the temptation of drugs. And his grandmother is in her 60s and suffering from chronic diseases. Mabry feels distant from this reality and like he's partially to blame because he participates in the socioeconomic system that lets this happen.

Cofer, an educated Hispanic woman living in England, feels humiliated and even offended, by the constant prejudice she faces. She mentions an incident a bus where a young man broke into a rendition of the song "Maria" from West Side Story as soon as he laid eyes on her. Another later where a man in a hotel restaurant stood in front of her and started singing a dirty song about a girl named Maria. Both incidents drew crowds of people and Cofer couldn't do anything but stand by and feel humiliated. She speaks of other instances in her life where the way she dressed (which was a normal way for females to dress in her native Puerto Rico) was seen by students and teachers in her New Jersey high school as hopeless and vulgar. These stereotypes have followed her for most of her life and she has had trouble dealing with the constant culture clash.

Both authors acknowledge that they'll never be able to escape their culture or heritage. Cofer even states that the stereotypes associated with one's culture are also hard to get away from. Mabry experiences this through feeling guilty and powerless. While Cofer experiences it through feeling misunderstood and humiliated at times.

Where you come from is not who you are, but it is a part of you that can never be taken away or forgotten. Cofer views it as, "You can leave the island Puerto Rico, Master the English language, and travel as far as you can, but if you're Latina... the island travels with you." Mabry says it differently: "As I travel between the two worlds it becomes harder to remember just how proud I should be – not just because of where I have come from and where I am going but because of where they are (his family)."
