We love hearing music because it provokes feelings. Why do confident sequences of noises stimulate us while others, including the noise made by cars in motion, bother us? Music is pleasure. Based on the French composer Edgard Varese's description, "music is organized sound." The primary elements of any sound are: strength, pitch, duration, rhythm, beat, spatial arrangement and reverberation. Our mental faculties organizes these fundamental perceptual characteristics into higher-level concepts. The big difference between music and a randomly set of noises has to do with how its simple aspects are blended and the relationships in between them are established. When these primary components come together and form significant associations, higher-level principles such as tonality, melody and harmony arise. This fact distinguishes them from common noises that disturb us, for example the barking of a pet dog or the noise of automobiles. The brain reacts to music in the same manner it responds to a particular type of tasty foodstuff or drug. In all of these scenarios, the pleasing sense is mediated by the discharge of dopamine, according to a research released in the Nature Neuroscience magazine. Music incorporates into the human brain circuit, which is accountable for generating determination. Each and every time we carry out an action that we want to perform repeatedly, dopamine is launched. This is also true when we eat good food or have sex.
