WHEN TO CALL A PLUMBER IN LOS ANGELES?

In many instances, homeowners allow small plumbing issues to linger until they grow into much bigger problems. After all, a small decrease in water pressure or a slight leak in your faucet isn't a big deal, right? In many cases, that is unequivocally wrong. Listed below are some of the telltale signs that it is time to contact a plumber in Los Angeles and schedule a consultation.

Decreased water pressure

Many homeowners wait until water pressure has decreased dramatically before they enlist plumbing services in Los Angeles. While a slight decrease in water pressure may initially seem harmless, it could be a symptom of an issue that is much more significant like a pipe leak or something obstructing your water line. If not repaired in a timely fashion, those small leaks can eventually turn into something much more significant.

You notice "water stains" on your walls

Though it may just seem like a cosmetic issue, it may very well be the result of a pipe break or leak behind your walls. If left unchecked, it can lead to major damage to your home. It is important to note, that it is typically much less expensive to fix a problem at its nexus before it grows into a larger and more costly issue.

Your hot water stops working

Unless you are in need of a morning shock, a cold shower is typically not a pleasant experience. When your water stops running hot, it is usually an issue with the water heater. In some cases, it may just need to be repaired. In other cases, your water heater might need to be totally replaced. This is not something to experiment on yourself. Water heaters are complex systems that should be repaired and/or replaced by a plumber in Los Angeles. At LeadingEdge Plumbing, we only recommend a replacement when it is necessary and the best solution to your problems.

Problems with sewage system

The signs of a sewage line problem can include your sinks and tub not properly draining, an odor coming from your drains/toilets, and your toilet having issues flushing. In some cases, this can be due to something obstructing the line like a tree root. In other instances, it may be an issue that the City of LA has to deal with. Either way, you will likely need the trained eye of a plumber in Los Angeles to properly diagnose the problem.
