

Best Handheld Vacuums

Handheld vacuums are great for cleaning almost any surface, including hard wood, tile, carpet, upholstery, sofas, and just about anything else you could possibly clean in your home. However, there is another type of handheld vacuum that you may want to consider instead of the typical corded vacuum. The cordless variety can cost up to three times as much, but there are several good reasons to go with them instead. First of all, cordless cleaners are more portable. You can bring one around the house for cleaning all the dirt in the car without having to worry about lugging around yet another cord.

Cordless vacuums can also be much more powerful than corded ones. Some cordless canister models can produce up to 2 horsepower or more, which gives them the ability to clean all sorts of hard surfaces from stairs to your car. Even if your floors are covered with carpet, you can use a cordless vacuum cleaner on the stairs to suck up the dust bunnies that are all over the carpet. On the other hand, with corded vacuums, you have to hold the hose down between carpets, hold the cord in your hands, and maneuver the device up and down the stairs. If you have kids, they'll love it, but others will think it's a waste of their valuable real estate.

Another advantage to cordless powered cleaners is portability. If you have a regular floor cleaner and it's just sitting in the corner, you may never even get the chance to use it. However, a handheld vacuum cleaner is so much easier to store. You don't have to worry about whether or not you can get to it when you need to. You just simply put the device in a small bag and you can take it anywhere.

Many cordless models also have a wide variety of attachments that you can attach to it. For example, there are suction cups that can be used for removing scuff marks from furniture. There are also brushes and a variety of brushes and power heads that will allow you to remove stains and dirt that comes off of wood furniture. Many cordless vacuum models will also have tools that allow you to clean broken appliances, such as your washer and dryer.

One of the biggest disadvantages of corded handheld vacuums is their limited suction power. Although most cordless devices have very powerful suction power, some are not powerful enough to suction larger particles, such as pet hair. This can make them ineffective for cleaning carpets and other large areas. On the other hand, many cordless vacuum models have very long lasting batteries, which make it easy to use on a daily basis. If you're only going to be using the device for once in awhile, this isn't a major disadvantage.

Another common item found in most households is the canister vacuum cleaner. These devices are similar to handheld vacuums, except they come in a canister form. They are usually powered by an engine that is similar to a car engine. A motor will push the canister down through the dirt, pulling up loose dirt and debris with its brush. The dirt can then be expelled through the vacuum hose. While most canister model are powered by electricity, some canister type vacuums are powered by propane gas.

For those who are allergic to chemicals, one of the most popular types of hand vacuums is the HEPA (High Efficiency Particulate Air) cleaner. These devices are ideal for cleaning car seats and other areas that can house multiple small particles, such as pillows and mattresses. These devices are often smaller than handheld vacuums. They are also less expensive and more energy efficient than their counterparts. However, some people are allergic to the HEPA air purifiers, so this type of hand vacuum may not be the best choice for them.
