“Friendship is a single soul dwelling in two bodies”

Friendship plays a great role in our lives from our very beginning up until we sail away from this life. But let's have a look at some more ideas.

To begin with a considerable number of people consider friends to be a vital part of their life. Not only do they share amicable moments with them but also assist each other in tackling hardships and other problems, for so do real friends one would say.

As far as I can tell that is quite true because true friends do not only share common interests with us but also are deep inside the sole beings who understand us more than we express. For we are a mirror whose reflection is oneself's soul, thus I believe it is the sole reason why we call them true friends.

On the other hand there may be other facts to be taken into account. One might say that friendship is only a tool to achieve your ultimate goals, hence true friendship is nothing more than an idea, a grain of sand which sails into the desert of interest.

As far as I am concerned that is why Aristotle described it as a soul dwelling in two bodies. Therefore such things as listed above are called greed, interest and trust-abuse.

All things taken into account I bethink that Aristotle's saying is quite true, as it should be, also I would say that lucky are those who find a true friend in these trying times.
