

Wallace and Associates Inc

What makes a good lawyer?

A good lawyer has many effective and fine qualities, and Wallace & Associates will enumerate them in the following:

A good lawyer has many effective and fine qualities, and Wallace & Associates will enumerate them in the following:

Good analytical skills: Knowing huge amount of significant information is needed in both the study and practice of law. A good lawyer must have the ability to extract that information into something convenient and logical. Wallace & Associates knows that more than one reasonable conclusion is possible at times, as well as more possibilities of different patterns in order to resolve a situation; therefore a good lawyer must have the necessary skills to properly evaluate which one of those info is the most appropriate for a certain situation.

Good research skills: The ability to research quickly and effectively is crucial in preparing legal strategies, and a good lawyer should have a complete understanding of his or her clients' needs first in order to do so. Similarly, a good lawyer should be able to absorb and comprehend large amounts of information before preparing legal strategies. Good research skills can lead those materials into something manageable and useful.

Good people skills: Being amiable, convincing and able to read others are important qualities of a good lawyer because it allows them to assess the juror's reactions and the truthfulness of witnesses. Wallace & Associates in Singapore wants you to remember that an intelligent mind alone is not enough to be a good lawyer because being a personable person also has the same degree of importance with intelligence due to the fact that lawyers stand on behalf of people, and create decisions that could have an impact on those peoples' lives. In order to achieve the desired outcome, a good lawyer must have a good people skill to choose the best approach to take on a given situation.

Good communication skills: A person, especially an aspiring lawyer, can improve his or her communication and speaking skills by participating in various activities like general public speaking or mooting during college. However, a good lawyer must also be orally fluent and must have good written communication skills because they need to produce a variety of legal documents. Wallace & Associates finds it evident that good public speaking skills are essential to argue persuasively in the courtroom before juries and judges. Furthermore, good listening skills are also significant to analyze what clients tell them, or to follow a complex testimony.

Good judgment: It is necessary for a good lawyer to create practical and logical conclusions or assumptions from limited information. Seriously considering those judgments can help you foresee possible areas of weakness in your argument and find ways to strengthen them. A good lawyer should also be able to identify the points of weakness in an opposition's argument. There will be a lot of important judgment calls to make; thus, decisiveness is also a part of judgment.

Creativity: In addition to being analytical and logical, being creative in solving problems is a plus point for a lawyer. Lawyers are often needed to think differently in order to outsmart their challenger because sometimes the best solution is not always the most obvious.

Persistence: Before you even begin working as a lawyer, it is certain that you'd been through a lot of challenges during your studies. Having a strong commitment is already in you, and you need that when working on a case. You must be consistent and strong-willed in completing the work essential to drive the case into a successful finish.

Good reviews have been abundant in Wallace & Associates for having exceptional services for many years now. Paul Wallace has more than 20 years of extensive experience in law and employment relations and is legally qualified with a Bachelor of Laws Degree and a Bachelor of Arts Degree. He often receives little to no complaints from his clients. Contact him today and witness his excellent service.