

California Reducing Disparities Project
a culturally responsive mental health initiative

A Culturally Responsive Mental Health Initiative

California voters have a unique history of anticipating and addressing critical policy issues well ahead of the national curve. With the passage of the Mental Health Services Act in 2004, Californians demonstrated their distinct character and courage in putting our government to work for all its people. We did this by recognizing that the crisis in national health care compels us to define mental health as an essential right, alongside access to medical care and prevention. Painfully, it is a right that has been unevenly recognized and protected among marginalized communities. To make progress, things had to change. We needed to fundamentally reconsider how mental health services were being designed and delivered to our many diverse communities.

The California Reducing Disparities Project is an unprecedented, historic, cross population solution that has never happened before at a state, national, or international level.

African Americans; Asians and Pacific Islanders (API); Latinx; Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer, and Questioning (LGBTQ+) communities; and Native Americans are now a plurality in California. Reflecting honestly, it was clear our public health system repeatedly failed these communities. In many cases, the system was contributing to ongoing and historic trauma by reinforcing and enforcing racist and discriminatory policies, procedures and practices. The Mental Health Services Act opened the door for a new generation of practices and policies to begin transforming our assumptions and approach. After many years of funding traditional clinical approaches, this movement produced the California Reducing Disparities Project (CRDP) within the Office of Health Equity, at the California Department of Public Health. The CRDP establishes a platform for community defined evidence-based practices (CDEP) to orient and ground the next generation of care.

A goal of this project was to build a new body of knowledge coming from these communities. The intended goal was that these communities get the services they need and can most benefit from, and designed by communities that look like them and understand their needs...There had already been lots of research and documentation of why these problems existed. The project was designed to move beyond the defined problems and fund a vision toward new solutions and new approaches.

This project was seeking to grow new evidence to address the historical disparities in care and in research. It was designed as a community investment in growing new community-based evidence, from a Community Participatory Research approach. We sought to begin to add to evidence through the evaluation of projects these communities said were effective...But I had no evidence back then!

At that time, the Mental Health sector was headed toward funding only “Evidence Based Practices”. Unsurprisingly, our communities also had large disparities in this. ‘Whose Evidence?’ was a popular response. We pushed back on the idea of implementing evidence-based programs not based in our communities. This was another successful advocacy approach for creating the CRDP. We coined the term ‘Community Defined Evidence’ for this project.

Culture is prevention. The Western clinical model is not enough. The CRDP is an opportunity to prove that our traditional practices are effective, including deculturalization and decolonization.

Drawing stakeholders from all corners of California, the CRPD was an act of hope for the hundreds of contributors who participated. Together they helped to craft, test and communicate the complex questions that the Office of Health Equity considered in its deliberations on reverse engineering the systemic issues confronting the growing needs of our communities. This work, this story, became the expression of our collective democratic voices across five significantly underserved California populations. It became the intersection of public health, public policy, and the public interest. The CRPD before us today is the imprint of this intersectionality, the contours of which define our narrative and distinguish our impact.

Initiative Highlights

1. Mental health disparities across our five population groups are unconscionable, intergenerational, and given the lack of investment, seemingly intractable.
2. California Reducing Disparities Project (CRDP) funds 35 culturally responsive, innovative Implementation Pilot Projects (IPPs) across the state of California working in the five population groups: African American; Latino/x; Asian and Pacific Islander; Native American; and LGBTQ+.
3. IPPs are implementing proven community derived mental health strategies and programs, including but not limited to, Traditional Healers; Life Coaching; Sister Circles; Mindfulness, Radical Inclusivity, and Bilingual/Bicultural Outreach Workers. Collectively, these approaches leverage the historical knowledge and assets of our communities, and improve mental health along the life trajectory.
4. The goal of the CRDP is to simultaneously demonstrate that community derived mental health practices reduce mental health disparities across the five unserved, underserved, and inappropriately served population groups as opposed to traditionally funded mental health services based on Western clinical models.
5. The state must make a commitment to support, research, implement, and evaluate community-defined approaches such as those identified in the five CRDP Population Reports in order to reduce disparities. Intergenerational mental health disparities will remain intractable without a sustained and aggressive level of State investment.
6. COVID-19 exponentially amplifies health disparities across CRDP focus communities. Mental health implications of the pandemic will be acute and broad based but as decades of data demonstrate, clinical mental health strategies will not address the urgent need in African American, Latino/x, API, Native American, and LGBTQ+ communities. Now more than ever, California needs to invest in the community base infrastructure and promising practices represented by the CRDP to buffer the state's most vulnerable populations.
7. The state of California's support should go beyond Phase II funding of the CRDP, it must address the new mental health crisis resulting from COVID-19, and leverage all MHSAP Prevention and Early Intervention investments, state and local, to develop and institutionalize local and statewide infrastructure to support the reduction of mental health disparities in the face of unprecedented need.

Mental Health is a Human Right

Mental health in our community is no less essential than our physical and economic well-being. Underrepresented communities have negotiated oppressive systems for generations through culture, agility and resiliency. The strategies cultivated may have masked the underlying negative impacts on their personal and collective mental well-being. Our task is to understand this trauma and create the space for finding a new paradigm to move us forward. The question is how do we demonstrate its importance?

We have to investigate how resources are directed to ensure that everyone has equal access. Our commitment has to be proactive and it has to work for those who need it most. Reducing disparities in this field is not a matter of choice. It is essential for protecting the essential rights and liberties of all Californians. It is also a platform for addressing the structural and systemic inequities which lock people into generational poverty and injustice. Understanding the legacy of racism and discrimination that segregated and regulated opportunities in California and the United States is a first step. Applying these learnings as we move forward allows us to cauterize the harm and authorize the possibility for healing.

The hope we place in this work is not offered in a vacuum. We invest it through our relationships embedded in the organizations that serve communities today and have for generations. The program design of the CRDP expresses this by working through community-based organizations on the Implementation Pilot Projects (IPPs). Collectively, the IPPs represent decades of experience and credibility. By building evidence for the models and programs these organizations are running, we have learned lessons on the front lines that can inform policy makers committed to the mental health of their constituents.

CRDP is the culmination of the work in communities, not the excuse for it.

Culture is healing. Culture is life. Our shared goal is systems change through community defined evidence-based interventions.

Culture is Health

Cultural awareness is not a slogan. It is a strategy which unlocks community intelligence. The wisdom of listening to those we serve provides an advantage for any system operating with a public mandate, supported by public funding. The problems for mental health service providers are real, the need for resources is extreme. Frontline organizations serving diverse communities do not have the luxury of disengaging. These organizations are compelled to address legacy gaps in funding and focus by recognizing the capacity within our communities to design and activate solutions to the most acute mental health disparities in our state.

The CRPD initiative understands this and builds with a sense of possibility that by incorporating community intelligence into program design and delivery, greater numbers of people will find and engage the resources of the IPPs. These IPPs are more than delivery outlets for funding initiatives. Together they represent decades of experience and community capital, leveraged to advantage California in investing in more effective approaches to addressing the needs of its constituents.

Data driven and highly localized, the IPPs operate in 18 counties and serve TTKK Californians. What we are learning from these projects belongs to the people of the state. Rigorous evaluation and reporting are central to validating the results of these pilots. What we learn must be applied going forward if we have any hope of reducing the mental health disparities in our communities.

The CRDP is a culturally competent, evaluation and data driven movement that deserves continued funding and support.

A Place for New Thinking, New Solutions, and New Commitments

Community innovation is a persistent strategy learned and deployed to sustain ourselves in the face of systems designed to regulate and restrain instead of restore and reimagine. We have a narrative of change in the market that privileges profit driven markets such as technology and financialization. This ignores the other channels for change that impact our society. The dynamics of social impact are more complex than any operating system.

The ecology of human intelligence is expanding faster than any technology. Communications networks, formal and informal, are defying computational and broadband capacity. California is the home of an extraordinary share of the global innovation market. Its next great tide can come in public health. From responding to pandemics to unpacking generational poverty, no other state is better positioned for radical progress.

Scale requires smart implementation and prudent investment. California has to manage its resources while responding to unanticipated challenges. We are confronted by this today. Yet, how we cope and how we manage defines our best chances for success. We must leverage our community assets including community-defined evidence-based practices.

The CRDP is a culturally competent, evaluation and data driven movement that deserves continued funding and support.

The Ask

The moment to step up is now. The time for allies is here. The early results from the IPPs demonstrate the potential to make a generational impact on the very nature of mental health care services in California. By expanding the resources for CRDP, policy makers can accelerate the solutions being driven by the community-based organizations at the center of the project. The networks activated by the IPPs combine to provide a platform that the state would be unable to build on its own. Investments of this kind are rare.

We have the California voters to thank for their vision and commitment. Now it is our turn. Community health is an economic imperative to expand opportunity and ensure equal access. It also inoculates us from the adverse effects of poverty, racism and discrimination in ways that return greater value and impact than any other form of funding can. People of color and LGBTQ+ communities have survived centuries of pressure from systems designed without their consent, much less their sensibilities and intelligence. We are past the time when this is acceptable.

Now, a government of the people and by the people must open the possibility that together we can overcome the failings of our institutional past and commit to a future built together. This future requires the best evidence, the most robust practice, and the critical lever of culture to find its way to equitable mental health.
