This paper' is concerned with an examination of the powers and obligations of the private prosecutor in Canada and with assessing the viability of retaining such a role in the light of modern judicial developments.² For the purposes of this study, a private prosecutor is taken to be an individual, group, or corporation (other than a public authority) not acting in any public capacity.³ Although theoretically most prosecutions are "private" in the sense that they are pursued by various public officers who have no powers beyond those of the private citizen, they are not private prosecutions in the sense of the term as used here ⁴

⁴ Cf. Howard, Criminal Justice in England: A Study in Law Administration (1931). At p.3, Howard refers to Maitland: "Professor Maitland thought that it was misleading to speak of the English system as one of private prosecutions. 'It is we who have public prosecutions', he wrote, for any one of the public may prosecute; abroad they have state prosecutions or official prosecutions'."
