The first reason is that Crocs are practical. Their waterproofness and comfort have earned them a niche in the footwear world, just like the Goodyear welted boots. Their design is easy to adapt to any style or occasion. In recent years, the company has expanded its audience by collaborating with designers. Among them are the designers of Balenciaga, which created a clog with a three-inch platform.

The strawberry Crocs have a more youthful, hipper appeal. The brand has teamed up with many celebrities over the past few years. The most famous are Priyanka Chopra and Zooey Deschanel. These celebrities have all been wearing Crocs for years. They have been avoiding haters, and now they're being worn by friends and family members.

One of the most attractive things about the whack-a-mole surface of the Crocs clog is its unique appearance. The brand was once listed as an accepted shoe by the American Podiatric Medical Association, and has seen a recent rise in popularity. Even those who didn't want to wear them are buying surprising items. Karina Saucedo, a former "never-wearer," recently bought a pair of light purple Crocs, along with a lemon charm to add some pizzazz.
