

Unable to understand the closure reason of a meta post

Closed. This question is off-topic. It is not currently accepting answers.

This question does not appear to seek input and discussion from the community. If you have encountered a problem on one of our sites, please describe it in detail. See also: What is "meta"? How does it work?

Closed 4 months ago.

(Private feedback for you)

Edit question

My recent meta post was immediately closed and deleted without receiving any sensible feedback. Since the closure and the deletion were two different actions made by different people, I wish to focus only on the closure here.

Although I clearly stated my main question in this meta post, the post was wrongly closed less than about 15 minutes because of lacking details or clarity (!) and some people asked me to edit it. I followed their instruction and explicitly clarified what the main question of the post was; I asked the people who were unable to see the main question to ignore the whole post and answer the following question:

If a user has a meta issue and cannot find its solution by search on

Meta, asking on Meta, asking in chat rooms, talking to moderators, and contacting the community team, then what should he/she do?

Since the post was wrongly deleted, I put a screenshot of the post here:

HomeQuestionsTagsUsersUnanswered

I have some meta issue. I seek sure practical ways leading me to find the solution to my meta issue.

Notice: Please note that the questions appearing in the following section are marginal, so answerers can ignore them; however, people who are interested in them can answer them in comments or their answers. This post has only one main question, which is at the end of this post.

My Attempts

I mention my attempts here because some people dislike posts lacking any attempt.

Why do you not ask your meta issues on Meta?

I did that, but my post was wrongly (I do not want to question that action to my post here; however, I can prove my claim about it if I am allowed) closed and deleted by some community leaders (In fact, seeing that many obviously off-topic posts like fun posts are not considered as off-topic, which, in fact, are, one should not be surprised when such subjective actions happen to their posts).

Why do you not ask your meta issues from someone in a chat room?

I did that, but they responded that they were not the right person to answer your issues. I agree with them, and I should not have done that.

Why do you not ask your meta issues from moderators in chat rooms?

I did that, but when I was in the middle of talking to some moderator, a moderator suspended me for a long time and told me that you should ask your meta questions on Meta and not ping moderators.

Even, I requested some moderators to talk to them in a private room, but all of them were rejected.

Why do you not ask your meta issues in chat rooms without pinging specific users?

HomeQuestionsTagsUsersUnanswered

Why do you not ask your meta issues in chat rooms without pinging specific users?

I did that in the main chat room of Meta (It seems that anyone can talk about anything except some meta issues, disliked by a few people, in that room), but some room owner asked me to drop my issue and then kicked me out, and then some moderator suspended me for a long time.

Why do you not post the story of what happened to you on the main Meta?

I did that, but some moderator of Meta deleted my post because of (?) (As we know, moderators do not have to state reasons for their actions), and I was suspended for a long time (The moderators told me that you should not replied to other users in comments and should add your responses in your post; while we can easily see many people argue against each other in some comments under some post without being suspended. Honestly speaking, figuring out how Meta really works in practice is more difficult than solving open math problems).

Why do you not contact the community team?

I did that, but I do not know why my tickets immediately were marked "resolved" after submitting them without receiving any response from them (Maybe, they are too busy to handle my appeals, or questioning some moderators' actions are not welcomed, or ... (?). By the way, it is not better to change the name of "resolved" state to "rejected" in such situations?).

The Main Question

Stop ranting; you have bent our ears. What is your question?

After testing all ways I know, I wonder whether this puzzle is solvable or not; perhaps there exist some hidden ways so that novice user like me should ask you experienced users to become aware of them. So, my question is:

What should I do after testing all written ways while my meta issues are still unresolved?

support moderation help contact

Now, my question is:

What parts of the main question in the post is unclear? Do you have any problem in understanding the meaning of some parts?

After reading this meta post several times, I could not understand what the OP asks. Honestly speaking, which of them needs more clarity?

Updated

Since the moderators of this site already ordered me not to answer to users in comments (?), I have to put my responses here.

1. Some people insist on not understanding what I asked in that meta post. As I said in my meta post, I put "My Attempts" section to show others my attempts and that the described situation was not a hypothetical one; however, I clearly stated in that post that users can skip "My Attempts" section and answer the main question at the end of the post. Even, after the post being closed, I edited the post and clearly stated that you can ignore all things in the post and answer the mentioned paragraph.

- "Was it humor?" No, it is completely serious; I am not here for fun.
- "Some kind of performative"? Sorry, I have not extra time for such a goal.

2. Some people claim that the added paragraph after the closure was not at all clear from my original question. Honestly speaking, the paragraph starting with "Notice" cannot be seen in my meta post? Do I need to use headline fonts or table feature to show you my main question? I am really surprised how you experienced SE users cannot get the main question of the post while any regular user can easily.

3. Even, some people claim that the added paragraph was still unclear (?). Let me try my last chance. My question was:

If you face a meta problem (for example, a wrong suspension) and you cannot find the solution of your problem by informing other users, moderators, and the community team through the written and common ways, what should you do?

If the above question is still unclear, we certainly need some miracle or metaphysics.

4. Some people insist on defending that obviously off-topic Winter Bash post. I mentioned that example only to ask some people to devote their time, energy, and votes to close such obviously off-topic posts, instead of wasting their votes for closing obviously clear and on-topic posts.

5. Some people want to question my past history and defend some moderators. I do not want to talk about them now because they are separate issues. If "you cannot see my past history", let us not mention unreal reasons. I always state my issues respectfully; you can ask your friends, who are the moderators of this site.

6. Some people insist on talking about why my meta post was bad. However, in this post I only want to talk about the closure reasons of that post; if a post is bad, you can downvote it, but you should not close or delete any post not violating any SE policies only because you dislike it. If you consider a respectful criticism blame, this is your problem; if I am not allowed to criticize some actions, this is another thing.

7. Some people claim that I only want to receive the answers I want; this is completely wrong. I only want to be answered without using any silencing tools such as closing or deleting posts and chat- or site-suspension.

8. Some people threaten to close and delete this post. If this post were deleted, I would start a new meta post talking about the closure of this post. So, it is better to stop closing and deleting posts wrongly.