Dear Mr Uddin,

The exchange of information, documents and correspondence as part of a dispute or claim for compensation should not be used for any purposes outside of the claim without the permission of the Courts or the consent of the parties. Further, copyright attaches to every communication from Sainsbury's as well as the relevant data protection rights where names and contact information can be ascertained.

As advised on countless previous occasions, Sainsbury's, their employees, servants or agents do not consent to the publication of any of the information, documents or communications or any extract thereof and their rights should anything be published are expressly reserved.

Yours sincerely

CAUTION: This message was sent to you from outside of the organisation. Do not click links or open attachments unless you are expecting the email and know the content is safe.

Dear [redacted],

Although I disagree with you that I have misrepresented your words, can we agree that to publish (via on a platform that I have no control over) a statement from me along with my evidences accompanied by Sainsbury's response and Sainsbury's evidences. That way, I can't be accused of manipulating Sainsbury's response as I have no control over the platform used to publish our statements.

I will produce my statement/video first and send it to you by email; Sainsbury's can then produce its statement/response. That way Sainsbury's can "correct" any of my "manipulations", "misinterpretations" and "selective quotations". That is, Sainsbury's will have the final word.

My intention is that the public should be able to see a balanced version of our respective accounts that is supported by evidence and that our statements/videos should be published on a platform that I have no access to and therefore I cannot alter.

Members of the public should have the right to make their own view about what really happened and who is telling the truth. Is Sainsbury's interested in co-operating with me so that we can publish our own versions on a platform that Sainsbury's (or a third party) has control over? Is Sainsbury's committed to honesty and integrity?

Some suggestions where our statements can be published:

1) Sainsbury's website https://www.about.sainsburys.co.uk/news/latest-news

2) Sainsbury's account on social media (for example Facebook or Twitter) https://twitter.com/sainsburys https://www.facebook.com/sainsburys/

3) Any other website/platform that Sainsbury's has a control of

4) Any website/platform that neither Sainsbury's nor Mr Uddin have control of

Your answer to the above request will help me ascertain the level of integrity (or the lack of thereof) Sainsbury's is committed to.

Regards,

Mr [redacted] Uddin (Mobile: 07[redacted])
