A caftan or generally known as Kaftan is a loose fitting outer garment or a simple garment reaching from shoulders to somewhere between hips or ankles, which have been worn across the globe for many years. The kaftan is often worn as an over coat with long sleeves.

It is made of fabrics like wool, cashmere, silk, or cotton. In West Africa, the female robe is called a kaftan, and the male robe is called the Senegalese kaftan.

The Kingdom Morocco is a country which is popular with its history, traditions, culture, religion, and geography. The dress code is one of the main factors that have influenced its diverse cultural heritage.

Traditional clothing for women and men in Morocco consists of long flowing robes with headscarves and customary slippers. They are available in pleasant colors and comfortable fabrics, these magnificent costumes have been worn since the ancient times, and still are a part of the dressing style of the country.

The materials of the Djellaba are modified according to the weather. During the summers, light cotton made Djellaba and during the winters woolen Djellaba is worn. These are worn by Moroccan women in particular occasions such as weddings or engagement parties.

The kaftan has also been loved by other cultures and all of them have their own version and views about the garment. The Russians consider kaftan as a completely different type of clothing which was worn by men with the shape of lengthy suits with stiff but comfortable sleeves. It is noticed that kaftan was worn commonly by peasants and merchants.

Today's fashion world makes the kaftan suitable for Western fashion and the designers are very much impressed by the Moroccan Design Clothing, and these current versions are mostly made from cotton or silk. Evidently, modern day women and men kaftan designs are flexible and can be worn for a number of different occasions by different age groups.
