Music has been with us since time immemorial. The oldest musical instruments date back tens of thousands of years. However, no one knows why we love music and what needs it satisfies. Researchers still cannot find "music centers" in the brain. Like many other higher-order processes, the tasks associated with processing and listening to musical compositions are distributed across several areas of the brain. One study has shown that when focusing on certain sounds, there is increased activity in the right temporal lobe, which is responsible for hearing. Several other studies have shown that the temporal lobe is a key area that "understands" musical works. Other research has focused on our emotional response to music. In 2001, an experiment by McGill College used brain scans to study the neural mechanics of the creeps that are often triggered by listeners' favorite music. As a result, they found that the same areas of the brain are activated that are activated when responding to other euphoric stimuli such as food, sex, and drugs. That is, increased blood flow to areas of the brain associated with emotions and arousal.

While the stimuli associated with food and sexual intercourse are vital for humans, the fact that similar neural activity is also observed in humans while listening to music suggests that perhaps these are our evolutionary advantages that allow us to receive pleasure is not only from food, sex and drugs. In adolescence, we create connections between music and our emerging identity (both personal and social). Our adolescent experiments with music help with the emotional upheavals of adulthood and leave marks. Music, which affects our emotions the most, often continues to influence us in the same way until the end of our days. All in all, music occupies a special place in a person's life and provides an immersive emotional experience that we all adore.
