

Need for Speed Movie Review

---

It has been some time since a movie on a video game was released. Video game movies rarely turn out to be good and that is probably why they seem to be discouraged. Somehow, a daring attempt is made to make a video game movie on a popular game Need for Speed. We have seen Mario Bros., Mortal Combat, Street Fighter and Final Fantasy but their popularity heavily relied on their existing franchise. This time however, it turned out to be different. The Need for Speed movie not only had excellent production but the storyline was well executed. Those who have played the series will know how the story picks up and it all makes good sense where the story is going. The effects are amazing in the movie and the best part is the cars you get to see. Some of the fastest cars like Beatty Verona and Lamborghini Gallardo are visible in the movie. There are many other cars in the movie, and one would wonder how they got the funds to get these cars together. If you are all about excellent cars then you will finally get to see them in this movie with the original sounds of their engines roaring. Those people who have seen this in the cinema will definitely appreciate the sound effects in the movie.

Marketing and Popularity

This film was definitely aiming high because it was raising its popularity through an effective marketing campaign. You would see its ads on Super Bowl spots, and trailers that show the racing work done in the movie. Definitely even the critics would appreciate that if you are in for some good effects and great car stunts then this is the real deal. You will see some long shots of fast cars doing big stunts by professional drivers. You will see crashes but it is actually the near-misses that will impress you the most. If you also like Imogene Potts then that will work like a bonus addition. Her role is more than just 'the girl' but a rich sponsor of a racing event who takes part by force. There are some interesting and funny scenes in the movie and it may seem predictable but it all goes away when you get to see those cars again. Do not let the mixed review mislead you because this movie is a good bang for the buck.

Aaron Paul

Fans of Breaking Bad definitely must be looking forward to this movie because this actor definitely made a great impression in the TV series. He still does not disappoint in the movie and the entire role turns out to be just as impressive and mature. He also carries a simplistic dress code throughout the movie, like a typical street racer who does not mind messing his hands in the workshop. For everybody else, those who enjoyed Fast & Furious movies, they might like this one as well.

Summary: The Need for Speed is a popular game franchise that finally found itself a movie with a couple of good characters. The range of cars is amazing and the entertainment value is good. This is recommended for those who are looking for action and thriller.