The Forgotten Survivors

When Ingrid's daughter died by suicide she couldn't imagine the trauma that would face her. Today the Guardian exclusively reveals the impact of suicide bereavement after the Health Select Committee recommended new measures of after-care for families left behind

Luke Hastings

National

Michelle was 28 years-old. Her mother Ingrid von Hunnius says she was "bright and intelligent" after graduating with a master's degree in Ingrid recalls the night they stayed up until the early hours of the morning partying before Michelle left for a trip abroad to work in India. She then points to a photograph of Michelle on the mantelpiece. Ingrid's next words are heartbreaking: "Six months later, she was dead."

Michelle died by suicide after overdosing on pills prescribed to treat her depression when she returned home from India.

It was then that Ingrid's "hugely traumatic" experience began.

"I don't know how to describe it, it's not just one emotion. It's shock It's sheer terror. It's indescribable.

"The pain was intense, severe and all-consuming. It's tsunamis of grief. "It felt like somebody had hit me in the solar plexus. It stunned me really. You go beside yourself. You've never really experienced anything like it. I think you get put onto the baseline of survival." she savs

Ingrid explains she felt isolated and lost in society, depressed by the stigma that faces those who are bereaved by suicide.

"I find that with the general public or with friends I can't fully express myself because she's still part of me. I don't bring her up because people don't talk about bereavement by suicide," she says

With no postvention support, Ingrid was then left feeling suicidal.

"I had this sense that I was walking around this dark hole and I could just slip into it. One day it occurred to me that if I took a lot of tablets I could get into that dark hole, because I thought Michelle was in there," she says. Now, the Health Select Committee has recommended new after-care measures for those like Ingrid - the forgotten survivors of suicide. This follows the committee's four-month inquiry into suicide prevention. The committee's interim report, released in December, suggests more primary and secondary support for the families left behind after suicide. The report says those bereaved support" or a family liaison officer, which would be standard practice in many other causes of death. The full report will be released at by suicide are "not entitled to any

the end of this month with complete details of the support the committee

Labour MP Ben Bradshaw was part of the inquiry and says those bereaved by suicide are "left to fend for themselves"

"We (the Health Select Committee) feel very strongly that there's not enough support for families. There's not a consistent enough approach across the country in the way that families are helped and supported,"

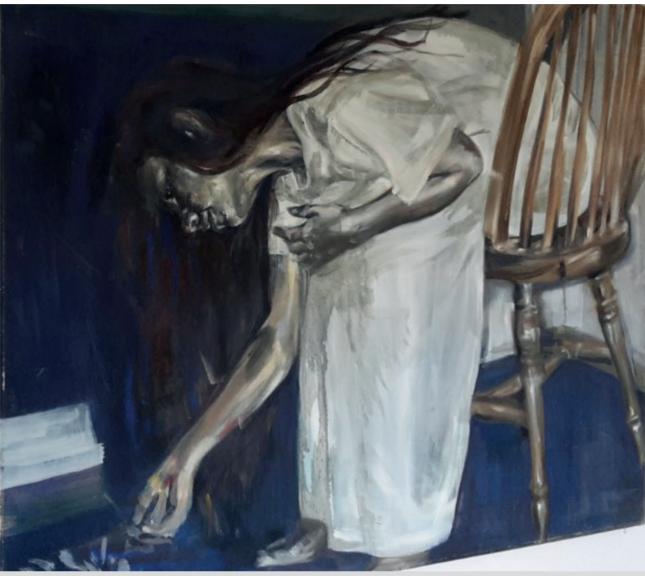

The committee's MPs aren't alone in feeling there's not enough support. According to an exclusive Guardian survey a resounding 97% of people don't think families bereaved by suicide are given enough help.

The committee's report called suicide rates "unacceptable" and the Samaritans say a person takes their own life every 90 minutes in the UK. After suicide, the Office for National Statistics found that between six and ten 'survivors' are left behind, meaning up to 61,000 people are bereaved by suicide every year. Those loved ones are three times more likely to take their own lives, according to the Centre for Suicide Prevention. Mara Grunau is the Executive Director at the centre, which is based in Canada. They have the largest

A painting of Michelle, given to Ingrid by her daughter's schoolfriend. It sits on the wall in their family home.

Ingrid displays a selection of Michelle's favourite toys next to a framed painting of her.

Left: Mara Grunau, Executive Director at the Centre for Suicide Prevention. Middle: Halani Foulsham as a child with her mother, who died by suicide in 2014. Right: Shirley Smith, a bereaved mother and founder of 'If U Care Share'. Photographs: Centre for Suicide Prevention, Halani Foulsham, 'If U Care Share' collection of suicide research in the

She explains there's "no grief like suicide grief" and says that "postvention is critical prevention"

Mara also says research from the centre confirms those bereaved by suicide feel "shunned," leaving their grief "un-dealt with".

'It's not just one emotion. It's shock. It's sheer terror'

The Guardian survey reveals over three-quarters of people believe there's a stigma around suicide bereavement in the UK.

Survivors of Bereavement by Suicide (SOBS) say that the nsensitive use of language adds to that stigma.

According to the Guardian survey, 60% of the general public would say a person 'committed suicide' - even though the term 'died by suicide' is SOBS play a significant part in many survivor's lives, including Ingrid. After being unable to find any suicide postvention support, Ingrid teamed up with the charity to start her own support group in Bournemouth. Ingrid calls the group a "family"

However, she believes there's even a stigma around attending a support group for suicide bereavement.

"A group is like someone touching your hand, it pulls you out of that dark hole, but the stigma around it stops you putting out that hand," she Ingrid says that her own children even believe it's "bizarre and sick" that she runs the group. Stigma isn't the only issue with support groups, as SOÉS groups only run once a month, which can be a problem for many who need more Halani Foulsham had to wait 30 days to attend a group after "having a bomb dropped on her life" when her mother died by suicide in 2014.

Following the Health Select Committee report, Halani says she's concerned that even if there's more support available in the future. it von't mean much" if people don't know it exists. She says this is a big problem in her experiences with current services.

Ingrid and Halani are not alone in trying to make a difference to postvention, which currently fails bereaved families.

Shirley Smith lost her "normal, bright and witty" 19-year-old son Daniel to suicide in 2005

She believes the new report is a "huge step" in bringing suicide postvention into the forefront of the political spectrum. However, she's wary that the report could be "just

Following the death of her son, she founded the charity 'If U Care Share' alongside her children who were left "devastated"

The Health Select Committee mentioned Shirley's Durham-based foundation in their report, as they've pioneered a new system in England to help those who are bereaved by Working closely with Durham Police and the local health trust, they provide a 48-hour service to the survivors left behind after a suicide in the area, helping them with everything from emotional support to how to deal with the coroner's inquest. Since it started in September 2014, the service has helped 94 people to get through the aftermath of their tragedy Shirley believes her charity's system is "critical" for those who have lost a loved one through suicide and says it should be funded nationwide.

Durham's Labour MP Kevan Jones believes similar arrangements to the 'If U Care Share' system will need to be put in place if the newly proposed

He thinks the report is a "very important" step in the right direction and stresses there needs to be "clear pathways" for those bereaved by suicide to get support.

'We (the Health Select Committee) feel strongly that there's not enough support for families'

Liberal Democrat Shadow Health Secretary Norman Lamb thinks there should be a consistent national support network in place. He says current services are "wholly inadequate"

The North Norfolk MP had his own experience with being bereaved by suicide after the loss of his sister in

He believes it's "incredibly important" that the government fund new support services and allow thirdparty voluntary organisations to run

"People find it impossible to move on after a suicide. There's often a lot of guilt and sometimes anger. The net effect of those emotions is that the person becomes quite trapped. "Ensuring that someone has access to counselling and support is critical," Conservative MP Charles Walker is the vice-chair of the All-Party

Left: Labour MP Kevan Jones speaking to an audience about his own depression in 2015. Photograph: Flickr Creative Commor

Liberal Democrat MP Norman Lamb addressing a crowd at the NHS Confederation in 2014. Photograph: Flickr Creative Commo

added to my grief Just months after the suicide of her

How the media

husband, Lin picked up a national newspaper to find family photos lifted from her Facebook profile. "I was devastated. There were photos of my children," Lin says. The pictures, which sit along the windowsill of her conservatory, were alongside an article about her husband Ray's death. The article claimed pension cuts by the government in 2012 were a major cause of his suicide. Lin says that "definitely" added to her grief. "That made it much worse," she says.

Read Lin's full story online at: www.theforgottensurvivors. wordpress.com.

her and her family devestated. Photograph: Luke Hastings

Explore online

You can learn more about suicide bereavement online by viewing additional content from this Guardian investigation at: Buzz. Bournemouth.ac.uk/2017/01/ interactive-content.

Parliamentary Group for Suicide about the current lack of suicide funding will be unlikely due to

However, he's worried further

Suicide attempt survivor Paul

Scates thinks it's "pathetic" that an excuse for not providing suicide at the age of 17 and is now a mental

NHS supporting people who suffer

Paul believes we are "letting people down" when they are "left

"doesn't cost much" to team those

He also thinks the new report is

For now, the families left behind

"vague" and is concerned it will after suicide will have to wait and see if the government will accept the recommendations made by the

ago, the same committee released

Shirley Smith said it resulted in very Perhaps now the tide is turning. As well as the Health Select Committee's

England recently released their guide inquiry into suicide, Public Health to providing local services to those

May said the government will tackle bereaved by suicide and Theresa

We will find out soon if the government will take action and the forgotten survivors of suicide.

more after-care will be provided for a similar report. However, critics including Halani Foulsham and Health Select Committee. Four years with nothing" and adds that it with experts like himself.

simply be "lip service".

little being done.

suicide last week.

with mental health conditions,

health expert, working alongside the Paul attempted to take his own life the government use austerity as postvention support.

postvention support.

economical restrictions.

Prevention and says he's concerned

Watch - Video interviews from Maytree suicide sanctuary in London, where the director and a volunteer speak exclusively to the Guardian about suicide prevention Listen - An exclusive interview with suicide attempt survivor Jonny Benjamin, who tells his incredible story. Interactive content - Find out more about suicide through an interactive timeline, galleries and an interactive infographic. including exclusive interviews. news, statistics and updates from Blog - Find more content, including those bereaved by suicide. how the Guardian carried out this investigation at: www.theforgottensurvivors. affected by suicide bereavement up wordpress.com. Survey - You can also view the full results from the Guardian's exclusive survey online.

Need help?

If you've been bereaved by suicide or are feeling suicidal and you

SAMARITANS 116 123

think you may need help, call:

5065