Testosterone belongs to a class of hormones known as androgens; in-fact this is the primary androgenic hormone. A very powerful hormone in its own right, testosterone is largely responsible for testicular and prostate development, as well as the development of muscle tissue, bone density and strength. The appearance of facial and pubic hair starting at puberty; later in life, it may play a role in balding. Testosterone, estrogens, and cortisol are examples of steroid hormones. Steroid hormones act on cells by passing through the cell membrane, entering the nucleus, binding to DNA, and initiating gene transcription and protein production. Anabolic steroid hormones are synthetic molecules that mimic the action of testosterone.
