As humans started to understand that different forms of hashish serve completely different purposes, they started cultivating each hemp and marijuana.

Hemp plants are likely to develop tall, thin, and 'fluffy'. Marijuana crops are quick, bulky, and stuffed with resinous fragrant flowers.

In 2737 BC, the Chinese emperor Shen-Nung used hemp oil topically for rashes and irritated skin.

When hemp arrived in Europe, it was used to make garments, ropes, and even constructing supplies.

Queen Victoria's doctor, J.R. Reynolds, prescribed her a CBD-rich pressure of marijuana to make her menstrual cramps more manageable.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, particularly within the United States, marijuana crops were bred to include wealthy concentrations of THC to make them more potent and psychoactive.

This thriving hashish tradition all came crashing down within the 1930's with the start of the marijuana prohibition.

In the 1980's, following the Battle on Drugs, President Reagan's administration invested millions of dollars in studies that have been aimed to show that marijuana triggered brain injury and cognitive impairment.

Not solely did those research fail to achieve the prejudiced politicians' targets, it also led to the discovery of the endocannabinoid system in humans.

At this time, researchers are rubbing their fingers collectively to go all-in with the studies on CBD, THC, and different cannabinoids. They need to understand the way it works, and what its limitations are.
