Main Units of the Norwegian Army c. 15 April 1940

The Norwegian army of 1940 was organised into six District Commands (DKs), each responsible for all units within a geographical area. The main combat unit of the Norwegian army was the infantry regiment (IR), supplemented by a number of independent units. Each regiment had two regular infantry battalions, an artillery battalion and a bicycle company. In addition, most regiments had at least one battalion of so-called Landvern or militia.

The German Army in Norway, 1940

A German Infantry Division (ID) in 1940 had at full strength about 16,800 men. Of these, some 500 were officers, 2,500 were NCOs and 100 administrative personnel. It normally consisted of three infantry regiments (IR), each with three battalions. Each battalion usually had four companies and one artillery regiment (AR) with three or four battalions of 105-mm or 77-mm field howitzers. In addition, there were Pioneers, reconnaissance units and anti-tank units, normally of battalion or company strength, plus an intelligence/signals unit. The divisions used in Norway were reduced in manpower and equipment, particularly artillery, and largely manned with conscripts drafted after the outbreak of war. Only a handful of the officers and NCOs were career soldiers.
